i) Read the following passage and answer the questions that follow:

I was amazed. Here before my eyes, a white baby, for they were little more than babies, was imposing his will upon a black boy. And the black boy submitted. I puzzled within myself as I went down the road. Could it be that the dark boy was the son of a servant in the home and therefore had to do that white boy's bidding? No. They were obviously dressed alike, the dark boy was of equal class with his playmate. No, they were playmates, the dark boy was a neighbour's child. I was sure of that. Then how was it that he obeyed so faithfully the white boy's orders? Was it that even at his early age he sensed that in his own country he would be at the white man's beck and call? Could he in such youth divine a difference between himself and the white boy?
